In The Zoo

Class X10 gradually dragged their feet around the outside of the cage.

"They're amazing?" The students yelled as the teacher pointed out each animal inside the cage.

"Okay, students. Remember to record them as you go along," Mrs Ayala's voice increased in volume and echoed thunderously but everyone was busy with their observations of the animals.

"Miss? This animal is not moving. Is there something wrong with it?" One classmate asked and everyone's eyes were immediately focussed on the queer cage.

Mrs Ayala, squashed among the crowd, finally made her way to the front.

She investigated the animals and announced, "It's nothing. It's just that they are too concentrated on that box in front of them. They usually sit there for hours and hours and do not even move an inch. They can't live without it. Often when you try to put the box away from the animal, there will be a monstrous uproar! It's good to leave them alone."

"Oh well." The students soon lost interest in the animal and moved to the next animal.

As they walked along, a boy, holding his notes full of information whilst lacking on important detail moved closer to Mrs Ayala.

"Mrs Ayala, what was the animal called again?" He questioned Mrs Ayala. She, with her half-open eyelids, answered his question.

"How many times do I have to tell you, Benari? I said they're humans from Earth."
